This city is a large and important market ducts is not, except to a very limited excity from all parts of the country, and is therefore just that much capital attracted here for the benefit, in part, of Ohio people. And yet, notwithstanding this fact, and notwithstanding the very large amount thus annually paid out by the employes of our mills and shops to enrich Ohio farmers, there is a constant disposition to narrow sinded jealousy on the part of two or three papers over the river as to every dol-

been to try to obliterate any such feeling. We look upon Wheeling and all its saburban surroundings as in the same boat. We realize that it is only a matter of a few years when this city and these suburbs will be one compact mass of manufacturing population-divided still, of course, by the fiver, which is the common highway of all to the common markets of the South and West, but a river spanned by perhaps three or four bridges, over which are to pass interchangeably citizens doing business on one side and residing on the other

The information was to the effect that the hostiles had been drinking tizwin, and in a drunken row among themselves had killed one of their number. The troops left here on the night of the 9th, and found the camp on a high hill, commanding a view on every side, and well fortified with rocks. The camp was deserted, the hostiles having evidently been apprised of the approach of the troops. They found the dead body of an Indian, who was recognized as one of Cruz's scouts, named McKey. With four cents per bushel for mining, and with eleven cents as the present market price, the prospect is certainly not very encouraging. If the present rise came ten or fifteen days later they state the case would have been different. Much of the coal now affoat is in boats, the heaviest packages, and the present rise will admit of their shipment, which will increase the supply in the lower markets at least from eight to elevan million bushels.
